

I would like to respond to the proposal that the ftc wants to have a national telephone privacy law that would substantially override some of the present protection that the Indiana law gives me now. As the result of the present Indiana law, I have regained some of the quiet time at dinner with my family. I previously used to receive at least one call every day and sometime more than 2, sometimes as late as 9:30 pm. I do not think that my having paid for telephone service implies that I wish these telemarketing firms to contact me. I also do not believe that just because I do business with a particular company, that gives that same company any implied right to contact me for any reason unless I have so expressly consented to let them do such. please leave our state statute as is and leave this matter to the individual states to decide how to control the problem. Thank yoy
